In 2004, Hungary and other former east-bloc nations made a triumphant "return" to Europe. Supporters of the country's integration into the European Union argued that Hungary's re-entry into the European community would energize the nation in multiple ways, and would benefit all Hungarians economically, politically, socially, and culturally. This roundtable aims to look critically at this period, asking whether or not Hungary has been energized by its accession into the EU, and which communities or groups (if any) have benefitted (or suffered) the most.

16:00 Closing Remarks, Oliver Botar, President of HSAC
